Banking Activities and Local Output Growth: Are Private Banks Different From Public Banks?

(soavtorica raziskave je Zeynep Önder, Bilkent University - Faculty of Business Administration)

In the literature, there are two views that support the existence of state owned banks. In the "political" view, politicians use state-owned banks to provide employment, subsidies and other benefits to supporters, who return the favor in the form of votes, political contributions and bribes. The classic "development view" of state-owned banks is that government ownership can stimulate growth when economic institutions are not sufficiently developed for private banks to meet financing needs. In both the political and development views, the rationale for state-owned banks is to finance projects that otherwise would not be funded. In this paper, we empirically explore whether banking activities of state-owned banks in Turkey provide evidence on the "development" or "political" view at the provincial level. Our results support the political view for the existence of state banks. We find that credits provided by private banks have positive impact on the per capita real GDP. Unlike private bank credits, credits provided by state-owned banks do not have significant effect on local growth.
