will present the article:

"Pushed into necessity? Gender gaps in the labor market and entrepreneurship of women"

“The literature on entrepreneurship emphasizes the differences between necessity self-employment and aspirational self-employment. We exploit rich and diverse international data on patterns of self-employment from the Global Entrepreneurship Monitor to answer the question of whether labor market inequality is a relevant push factor for self-employment. To adequately measure labor market inequality we make use of adjusted gender wage and employment gap estimates for a large selection of countries. Our results show, as predicted by theory, that greater gender disparities in access to and in compensation for wage employment are associated with necessity self-employment, but not with aspirational self-employment. ”
